Collection Abstract:

The National Forests and Grasslands of Texas is a division of the United States Department of Agriculture. The four National Forests in Texas were created in 1933 and 1934 during the Great Depression, with purchased from local land owners and timber companies and authorized by the State of Texas. The Angelina National Forest, the Davy Crockett National Forest, the Sabine National Forest and the Sam Houston National Forest covered cutover timberlands that were gradually replanted and developed into a perpetual timber resource and recreation centers. The U. S. Forest Service – National Forests and Grasslands of Texas Collection consists of many thousands of photographic prints, negatives, and slides pertaining to the National Forests and Grasslands managed in the State of Texas. These photographs and slides show locations within Texas national forests and grasslands, events hosted by the U. S. Forest Service, natural disasters in Texas forests and grasslands, and the flora and fauna found in each national forest and grassland in Texas.

Biographical/Historical Note:

The National Forests and Grasslands of Texas is a division of the United States Department of Agriculture. Although eastern Texas is the western edge of the southern pine forests and its plentiful trees drew settlers and industry from the middle of the 19th century, recognition and preservation of these forests as a vital national resource did not become reality until the 1930's. This was possible, however, due to earlier legislative and executive actions. Congress created the United States Division of Forestry under the Department of Agriculture in 1881 and ten years later, the Forest Reserve Act of 1891 authorized the President to designate public lands as forest reserves for conservation purposes. In 1905, President Theodore Roosevelt created the United States Forest Service, giving it the charge to manage the newly created National Forest, appointing Gifford Pinchot as the first Chief Forester. Later in the 20th century, the economic realities of Great Depression led to the creation of twenty-six new National Forests. These forests not only satisfied the government and public's increased interest in resource protection, but became part of the socio-economic solutions for bringing the country out of the economic crisis. New government lands required new projects, which needed new workers, and thus workers local to the forests and those brought in through other government programs helped manage and conserve the land and were paid for their work.

Four of the new National Forests were in Texas. Although lumber companies and land owners determined the management of Texas's forests for the most part, there were several state initiatives to conserve Texas forests prior to the creation of the national forests in Texas. In 1902, the state worked with the U.S. Bureau of Forestry to plant trees as wind breaks in the Texas panhandle. Then, in 1915, W. Goodrich Jones and J. Girvin Peters sponsored a bill in the Texas Congress creating a state forest agency headquartered at Texas A & M College. As part of the push to form National Forests, the Texas legislature authorized the federal government to purchase both public and private timberlands as part of the new National Forests in May 1933. The U.S. Forest Service purchased four units of land to create four National Forests in Texas beginning in 1934.

The Angelina National Forest purchase comprised 388,700 acres of longleaf pines, shortleaf pines, and river bottom hardwoods in Angelina, Jasper, Nacogdoches, and San Augustine counties with a Ranger Headquarters in Lufkin. In the Davy Crockett National Forest, the government purchased of 394,200 acres in Houston and Trinity counties of mostly of shortleaf pine, loblolly pine, oak, hickory, pecan, sweet gum, elm, and walnut and established two Ranger District headquarters: the Neches Ranger District in Crockett and the Trinity Ranger District in Groveton. The Sabine National Forest comprised of 439,600 acres in Sabine, San Augustine, and Shelby Counties with the Ranger Headquarters in San Augustine County and was primarily longleaf pine, shortleaf pine, loblolly pine, and a few hardwoods. The final purchase created the Sam Houston National Forest containing 491,800 acres in San Jacinto, Walker, and Montgomery counties of mostly shortleaf and loblolly pine. President Franklin Roosevelt proclaimed all four of these forests on October 15, 1936.

In 1936, the four main objectives of the National Forests of Texas were: 1) production of repeated crops of forest products for use by residents and local industries, 2) development of recreational possibilities for public use and enjoyment, 3) experimentation and demonstration of forestry practices, and 4) protection of watersheds for the conservation of water resources and prevention of soil erosion. Much of the land purchased in the mid-1930s was cutover timberlands, so the Civilian Conservation Corps worked in tandem with the National Forests of Texas to begin replanting over 10 million seedlings in 1937. By 1955, the organization shifted its goals from a heavy focus on timber management to an emphasis on recreation. This change in objective coincided with the creation of three large reservoirs on National Forest lands in Texas.

The first of the reservoirs was the Sam Rayburn, or McGee Bend, Reservoir, authorized in 1945. Located in the Angelina National Forest, the Sam Rayburn Reservoir dam began construction in 1956 and water impoundment began in March 1965, ultimately flooding around 26,000 acres of National Forest lands. The Toledo Bend Reservoir was authorized in 1951 and was constructed in the Sabine National Forest straddling the Texas-Louisiana state line. The Toledo Bend Reservoir and dam flooded approximately 34,000 acres of National Forest lands. Finally, Lake Conroe was built in 1964 in the Sam Houston National Forest, impounding approximately 5,000 acres of National Forest lands.

Today the National Forests and Grasslands of Texas include four National Forests totaling approximately 637,024 acres of land and two National Grasslands totaling approximately 38,097 acres of land.
